Although I didn't post this idea on the internet until 2008, I actually thought of it while I was in college, at Texas A&M University, sometime during the late 60s.

I didn't try to draw a picture of this gizmo. I'll just describe it in words. It's a special drill chuck for your electric drill. It has a little marker built into the end of it. When you drill a hole in something, and the end of the chuck comes into contact with the material in which you drilled the hole, the marker draws a circle around the hole. The hole, of course, will be exactly in the center of the circle.

Then, you call your wife or girlfriend over to your work bench, puff out your chest, point to the hole that you just drilled, and in your deepest and most manly voice, say, "Lookie thar, Darlin'! Plumb smack-dab in tha middle o' tha circle, ever time!"

Your wife or girlfriend will say, "Wow!"

If she's from the South, then she'll wiggle, clap her hands in delight, and say, "Ah swannie, dahlin! Ah dew declayah!"
