

Random Acts of Stupidity, Incompetence, or Discourtesy Snow Slope

This document was first completed on Monday, January 17, 2022, and was most recently revised on Tuesday, January 18, 2022.

The owner of this car usually backs his car all the way to the end of the driveway, and parks it near the garage.

We had a snow storm during the night of Saturday, January 15, 2022, and during the day on Sunday, January 16, 2022. So, when the man in question here got home late on Sunday evening, there was snow on the ground. I watched, without being seen, as he parked his car. He moved it back and forth several times until he got it exactly where he wanted it. By doing so, he parked it at the only location along the entire driveway where he'd have to step out of the car onto a sloped surface, and walk on a sloped surface to get back in. At any other location along the length of the driveway, he could have stepped out onto a level surface, and walked back to the door on a level surface. Why would he make such a stupid change in his routine? Make a guess.

I went out, later, and shoveled the snow from the part of the slope where he'd have to walk, to get in or out of his car. I didn't do it for his benefit. I did it in the hope that he wouldn't slip on the slope, slide under his car, and sue for compensation.
